CENTAUR LINIMENTS.

There is no pain which the Centaur Liniments will not relieve, no swelling they will not subdue, and no lameness which they will not cure. This is strong language, but it is true. They have produced more cures of rheumatism, neuralgia, lock-jaw, palsy, sprains, swellings, caked breasts, scalds, burns, salt-rheum ear-ache, &c., upon the human frame, and of strains, sprains, galls, &c., upon animals in one year than have all other pretended remedies since the world began.

"Mr. Riley Hance, of this place, an aged man, has had a wonderful cure by your Liniment, and he wants it made known for the benefit of mankind. The following is his affidavit.

Yours truly, L. McQUOWN.

"State of Michigan, County of Eaton, ss.

"Riley Hance, on his oath, says: That for the last ten years he has been very severely afflicted with the Rheumatism, and has been for the last six years entirely helpless, inasmuch that he could hardly move, and had given up all hopes of ever being helped. And dependent further says that about five months ago, I commenced the using of Centaur Liniment, and it has produced wonderful results, and now I feel almost as well as ever.

RILEY HANCE.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 10th day of Dec., 1874.

Henry Black, of Ada, Hardin Co., Ohio, says: "My wife has had rheumatism for five years—no rest, no sleep—could scarcely walk across the floor. She is now completely cured by the use of Centaur Liniment. We all feel thankful to you, and recommend your wonderful medicine to all our friends."

T. G. Barnham, P. M., Little Lake, Wis., writes: "Last summer, I was induced to try a bottle of your Centaur Liniment on a bruised leg, and it gave instant relief. Since then I have used it in five cases, and it has not failed once."

DISCIPLINE OF THE JESUITS.

The method elaborated by Loyola and his immediate companions, for securing the organization of a rigidly disciplined and yet admirable pliant body of ecclesiastical warriors, is a theme on which many writers have dilated. It is indeed impossible to consider the series of "Regulations" and "Constitutions," of minute injunctions and astute exemptions, which make up the code of the Society, without becoming greatly impressed with the forethought and sagacity which could devise provisions so intricate and so nicely dovetailed. The law-makers of the Society have framed a set of ordinances and of privileges with skill that is perfectly marvellous. On the one hand, they supply every conceivable guarantee for crushing out any germ of independent impulse that could by possibility allow momentary play in an individual member to some movement of dissent, however suppressed and strictly mental, from any order emanating from his superior. On the other hand, they are studiously adapted to insil into those entrusted with the supreme direction of the society a sense of discretion so vast, so ample, and so completely freed from all ordinary limitations, that they may become absolutely imbued with the consciousness of duty, being wholly centered in the keen observance of whatever at any particular moment might recommend itself as especially expedient for making particular minds acquiesce more readily in their ascendancy. To this end Faculties are lodged with the supreme authority of the Order, which have no parallel in their range; while the whole plan of the extraordinarily protracted training, to which every member is subjected, has been carefully thought out with a view to the particular end of making him a thorough supple instrument ready at an instant to the hand of his Superior for any purpose. That powers of so vast a range might possibly be diverted by some Superior to other purposes, under dictates of personal ambition, was a danger which did not escape Loyola. No part of his organization is more noteworthy than the chain of checks and counter-checks for keeping each organ of the system, including the highest, to the precise mark of its intended functions, so as to let it neither lag behind nor yet exceed the measure thereof. A mechanism has thus been contrived, which, while exceptionally complicated, has yet worked with noiseless smoothness—setting in action a body of forces elaborately disciplined for the attainment of distinctly specified results, under the guidance of motive powers at once steered into inflexible rigidity as regards ultimate aims, and yet capable of Protean suppleness in the adoption of forms of procedure at the dictate of policy. It will be found that, while the General professedly figured as a mere Lieutenant holding a commission from the Pope, he was yet invested with certain Faculties in virtue whereof, in particular contingencies, he might consider himself the depository of powers that rendered the Order exempt from the authority of an innovating Pope.

The same spirit of jealous precaution is manifested in the provisions for securing the maintenance of the principles of the Society against a General who might perch

GOSSIP OF THE DAY.

PHILADELPHIA talks of abolishing the detective system.

A SINGULAR marriage was recently consummated at Susquehanna, Pa. The bridegroom was 74 years old, and the bride 13. The bridegroom has eight married children and several grandchildren, to whom he has introduced this little girl as mother and grandmother.

A YOUNG man of Rochester, who was severely injured by jumping from a train, was so annoyed by questions as to how he was hurt that he had a large number of cards printed, which he gave out to every one who looked inquiringly at his face or said a word about it. The card read as follows: "Busted this nose in jumping from a train of cars near Fairport, Thursday, April 29."

AN amusing episode is said to have occurred at one of the Moody and Sankey meetings in London where the ex-Premier was present. Upon heartily grasping Mr. Moody's hand, Mr. Gladstone said: "I wish I had your body." Mr. Moody made reply: "I wish I had your head." Mr. Gladstone again retorted: "I mean I wish I had your lungs." To which Mr. Moody again replied: "I wish I had your brains," and with hearty good wishes they parted.

A SPRINGFIELD (Ill.) Justice of the Peace was called down town three times to perform a marriage ceremony for a young couple, and, after two postponements, he succeeded in making them man and wife. The happy groom then discovered that he had only 50 cents to pay the Justice, and the latter was forced to take what he could get. On figuring up his expenses—car fare, etc.—he found that he had made just five cents by the operation. He thinks that couple began to practice domestic economy early.

THE Indianapolis papers have shown a natural jealousy of the growing rival of their city, and have indulged in various ill-natured flings at her late musical festival. In reply the Cincinnati Times makes the following neat hit: "It is false, sir, false—the only hog admitted to the building was the representative of the Indianapolis Sentinel, and he didn't squeal until he got home."

A CORRESPONDENT of a New York paper advances a novel idea in regard to churches being public, not private institutions. He says the church property in Brooklyn and New York is worth $360,000,000, on which no taxes are paid, and suggests that the laws should be so amended as to exempt from taxation all churches where one-half or more of all seats, pews and benches are free to the public, and taxing at half-rates all other. His theory is that if the public exempt churches from taxation on the ground of "Public Worship," they have a right to require churches to have public and not private worship.

It would be difficult to decide which is the most astonishing, a Japanese Senate or a Chinese steam frigate. The year 1875 is, however, to witness both these curiosities, and one of the steam frigates which China has lately added to her navy is to make a voyage around the globe. It is only a few years since that an eminent Chinaman, after visiting a foreign ship, expressed the opinion that while a steamer might do for foreign devils it was "too much piecee bobbey" for respectable Chinamen. Time has changed the popular Chinese estimate of the steam engine, and real Chinese engineers now manage real steam engines on real steam ships belonging to the Chinese government.

THE financial condition of Spain grows worse and worse every day; its revenue, which was $115,000,000 in 1871, is now but $80,000,000, and its debt, at 3 per cent., is fully $265,000,000, so that it would take almost the entire revenue to pay the interest on the national debt, if that interest were paid, as of course it is not. The war expenses now absorb $75,000,000 annually, or within $5,000,000 of the total revenue, the surplus going to the support of the church, the civil service, the magistracy, and the central department of public works. No improvement can be looked for until the end of the war and the pacification of Cuba, and even then a bankruptcy of some kind must be proclaimed.

Gov. TILDEN, in a recent special message to the New York Legislature, discusses in considerable detail the subject of municipal indebtedness, which is rapidly assuming enormous proportions in this country. He has obtained and publishes statements of the financial condition of twenty-four cities in the State of New York, which show the following results:

Assessed valuation of taxables.....	$1,569,535,074
Aggregate debt.....	175,657,267
Aggregate city taxation.....	36,439,121
Other taxes.....	34,980,487
Aggregate of taxation.....	71,419,608

The debt was equal to $75.80, and the annual tax to $21.55, per head of the population of the twenty-four cities. These debts and the annual taxation are on the increase. The debt of these cities is over 11 per cent. of the assessed value of their taxable property.

THOUGH the country has been suffering for a good while from panics, a general shrinking of values and hard times generally, the people still manage to buy and consume the average quantity of necessities and the lesser luxuries of life. The late report of the Bureau of Statistics makes rather a surprising showing in this respect. For instance, we have imported over $2,000,000 worth of tea during the last nine months in excess of the same period last year. For the same time we have imported $3,000,000 more of sugar, $300,000 more of woollens, $200,000 more of linens, $500,000 more of cottons, while the importations of coffee in excess of last year run up into the millions. The people are evidently determined to feed and clothe themselves anyway, be the times good or bad.

CHICAGO is overrun with confidence men, bunco operators, pickpockets, and thieves and swindlers of every description, and each issue of the daily press of that city records some of their exploits in the way of taking in unsuspecting visitors. The other day a prominent government official who had just arrived in the city from Washington fell into the hands of a brace of genteel-appearing, smooth-tongued sharpers, by whom he was fleeced out of a considerable sum of money. Parties visiting Chicago are warned against accepting the proffered acquaintanceship and friendly offices of plausible strangers. They swarm all over the city, watching the trains, and lying in wait for unwary victims. If a stranger accosts you on the street, claiming to have met you before, set him down as a rascal and have nothing to do with him.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Chicago Inter-Ocean describes that wonderful country lying near the source of the Rio Grande, in Southwestern Colorado, which offers, perhaps, the rarest scenery and the most remarkable mountain ranges on the continent. Within a radius of twenty miles there loom up 122 peaks over 13,000 feet in height, twelve of which measure over 14,000 feet. The canons and valleys are described by the few adventurers and explorers who have seen them to be grander than Yosemite and more varied than the wonders of the Yellowstone, while in their branching arms are lying riches that surpass the dreams of the gold-hunter. Dr. Hayden's exploring party are pointing that way this season, having given the region but a passing glimpse last year, and we shall know ere many months have passed the full extent of the mineral resources, and have that corner of the face of mother earth illustrated in photographs.

A Pioneer Baby.

In September, 1860, the first babe saw the blue Idaho firmament and breathed the crisp mountain atmosphere, under circumstances little less primitive than those which attended its Savior's birth. David Cartwright and wife were the parents who were rendered happy by the little fellow's appearance, and the boy was born under the spreading branches of a pine tree, which is yet standing, near the center of the village. This specimen nugget soon became the pet—and, it is said, the somewhat demoralized pet—of the rough miners, and, catching their roving disposition, he wandered around the confines of the camp at the rather youthful age of two years, with the apparent ease of an Arab. He was called "Rock," on account of his wonderful hardiness, and often showed his appreciation of the honor conferred upon him. The crowning act of Rock's life—so far as is known—was accomplished just before he discarded his swaddling garments, at the age of two and a half. While on his way to superintend the working of some extensive gulch diggings one day, he tumbled head foremost into a well, where the bottom could only be found at a depth of thirty feet. Upon striking he only found six inches of water, and didn't propose to be worried much by such a fall, so immediately commenced calling for help. It was his sad fate, however, to remain there six long hours before being discovered, but when men finally came to the rescue his pent-up wrath knew no bounds. There was no crying about it, but such a volley of invectives, upon the heads of neglectful parents, never before fell from childish lips. Here is a sample: "You fink I kin tay in a well all day wifout suffin t'e eat ike a fog? 'Fy wasn't no better fadder'n mudder'n 'ou I'd do wifout chillen!"—Rocky Mountain News.

"SHER" CAMPBELL.

How He Went on a Turkey-Shoot with Ted Seguin.

In St. Paul, Minn., Campbell and "Ted" Seguin heard one day that there was fine wild-turkey shooting in the vicinity.

"Turkeys!" said Ted. "I must have some."

"So must I," said Campbell. "We'll go out shooting, Ted, and have a day's sport."

"So we will."

Bright and early the next morning they were up, and, loaded with powder and shot and a double-barreled shot-gun, they started off.

There wasn't a "gobbler" within 50 miles, and after five or six hours' patient rambling, they became less particular at what they fired than they had been.

The dusk of evening was coming on, but not a turkey, or, for that matter, anything else in the shape of game, had been hit. Ted Seguin's sight would be spoiled by his eye-glasses tumbling from his nose just as he was about to pull the trigger, and Campbell scorned anything less than a full-grown gobbler on the wing.

Saddened and weary they plodded along homeward.

"What shall we do, Ted?" said Sher.

"I'll never do to come home without something."

"We had better not," replied Ted.

"We'll never hear the last of it."

"I have it," suddenly broke out Campbell. "I know a place where they have them for sale. We'll buy a couple and shoot them."

They started off to a poultry merchant's where they had noticed game for sale, and a bargain was struck for a couple of live turkeys—tame ones—which were set up at the end of the back yard, and nearly blown to pieces by the two sportsmen.

"You'll dress those, and send them down to the hotel, this evening, will you?" said they to the poultry dealer.

"Yis, sir; faith an' I'll do that same," was the answer. The sportsmen went home in good spirits.

"Did you shoot any turkeys, Sher?" asked the ladies, when they arrived at the hotel.

"Why, of course we did; that's what we went out for."

"Where are they?"

"Oh, they'll be here presently—we left them to be dressed. We'll have them for dinner to-morrow."

An hour or so afterward the turkeys arrived partially wrapped up, and were taken to the rooms of the ladies for exhibition.

"Now, Fanny," said Sher, to Fanny Stockton, who was prima donna of the troupe, "look at them; aren't they fine ones?" and Seguin and he had the covering off them in a twinkling, and laid them on the table for inspection.

"What do you think of them, Zelda?" said Seguin to Miss Harrison.

There were exclamations of admiration at first from the ladies, then a puzzled gaze stole over their faces, and they looked up at one another.

"What did you say these were, Sher?" asked Fanny Stockton.

"Why, turkeys, of course," said Sher, proudly.

"Certainly, turkeys; we shot them ourselves," said Ted, giving a glowing description of the woods in which they were shot, and the difficulty they experienced in getting near them.

Then there was a laugh. "Turkeys," said the ladies, when they regained their breath.

"Why, what's the matter?"

Another peal of laughter from the girls was their answer, to the astonishment of the sportsmen, who were beginning to feel very uneasy, and were thinking it was just possible that they might have been "given away."

"Will you answer me one question, Ted?" said Zelda Harrison, as soon as the girls had recovered a little of their equanimity.

"Certainly," was the sententious answer.

"How long ago is it since turkeys began to wear webbed feet?"

The rascally poultry merchant had sent a couple of geese to the hotel.

Instinct.

Prof. Hammond, of New York, relates many instances of instinct in animals. He says:

If the entire brain be removed from a frog, the animal will continue to perform those functions which are immediately connected with the maintenance of life. If the web between the toes is pinched, the limb is immediately withdrawn. If the shoulder be scratched with a needle, the hind foot of the same side is raised to remove the instrument. If the animal is held up by one leg it struggles. If it is placed on its back, a position to which frogs always object, it at once turns over on its belly. If one foot is held firmly with a pair of forceps, the frog endeavors to draw it away. If unsuccessful, it places the one foot against the instrument and pushes convulsively in the effort to remove it. Not succeeding, it writhes the whole body from side to side, and always in a forward direction.

All these, and even more complicated motions, are performed by the decapitated alligator. I have frequently seen the headless body of the rattlesnake coil itself into a threatening attitude, and, when irritated, strike its bleeding trunk against the offending body. On one occasion a teamster on the Western plains had decapitated one of these reptiles with his whip, and when bending down to examine it more carefully, he was struck by it full in the forehead. So powerful was the shock to his nervous system that he fainted and remained unconscious for several minutes. A natural historian relates that a viper whose head had been cut off moved determinedly toward its hole in the wall.

Humor of the Day.

[By the Detroit Free Press Friend.]

THIS is the season of the year when the man with a garden rushes into the house, seizes pen and paper, shuts his teeth together hard, and dashes off the following and directs it to his neighbor: "Dear Sir: If you don't keep your confounded hens out of my garden I'll kill every blasted one of them."

A Lacrosse street mother stepped to the door the other evening and called to her son, a lad of 11, who was one of a crowd seated on the edge of the walk. "Wait just a little while—just a minute," he replied; "I'm a hearing how some Injuns murdered a trapper, and I want to see if he got well."

An old farmer yesterday called on a portrait painter with a view of having his daughter's face transferred to canvas, but when told that it would cost him $50 or more, he stood in the door and remarked: "Do you take me for a lunatic? Why, I got my whole hoss barn painted over two coats, last week, for $21!"

WHILE a man was guzzling drink in a Larned street saloon yesterday a little ragged girl entered and sought him out, and instead of requesting him to come home, dear father, as poor brother Benny was dead, and the house was all dark, she whispered: "Now, old man, you'd better be dusting out o' here. Mam's coming around the corner with a club in her hand and both eyes shooting fire!"

A LADY passing up Grand River avenue, yesterday, heard a boy using profane words in his conversation with another, and she stopped and said:

"My dear boy, it grieves me to hear you make use of such profane language."

"Who's a using profane langwidge?" he asked.

"You were."

"No, I wasn't—I was only swearing at Jack!"

YESTERDAY a half-drunken fellow, armed with a club, came out of a saloon on Jefferson avenue, and as he brandished his weapon around he yelled:

"I'm going to kill some one!"

An elderly gentleman who looked as if he had experienced a great deal of suffering, halted and asked:

"Have you any particular choice whom you kill?"

"No, sir—find me some one!" was the answer.

"Well, I don't encourage murder," continued the oldish man, "but if you must kill some one I hope you'll knock over a tar and gravel roofer that promised to roof my house before that last shower!"

AN old lady, riding on a street car yesterday, took a clay pipe and tobacco from her pocket, and after filling the pipe and borrowing a match she leaned back for a smoke. The conductor entered the car, tapped her on the shoulder, and said:

"You can't smoke in here."

"I know it's a leetle crowded," she replied as she looked up, "but I'm used to travelin' and I guess I can put up with it!"

She was allowed to finish her pipe.

A widow missed the train, yesterday, and after tearing around the Central depot for a while she sat down on a bench; called her three children around her and wailed:

"Oh, why did I leave York State and come to such a country?"

"To git a man!" promptly replied her son William, a lad of ten. "I heard Mr. Shine say that's what you was coming for!"

She seized him and sat him down on the bench with such force that his hat was jarred down over his eyes.

Rum and Cheese.

A gentleman was dining at the table of a lady who refused to tolerate one drop of wine or spirits on her table, and who, when asked to entertain one of the British nobility, replied, "I can; but it must be understood that neither wine, ale, nor spirits are offered in my house." This gentleman, referred to as at her dinner table, said, "I enjoy a glass of wine, and I have got in the habit of using it. By-and-by you will take from us all our luxuries. I think wine promotes digestion. Did you ever hear of a man who could not eat cheese without hurting him? Then I suppose you would deny me cheese." She replied, "Did you ever hear of a man standing under a gallows, and saying to the witnesses of the execution, 'Now, my friends, take warning by me and never eat any cheese?' Or did you ever read in the newspapers when a man is murdered in our streets that 'those men had been eating cheese?' Show me that cheese produces nine-tenths of the crime, seven-eighths of the pauperism, one-half of the lunacy; show to me that cheese produces the result that drink does, and by the grace of God I will battle the cheese just as hard as the wine."—John B. Gough.

Superstitious Buch.

Herodotus and Xenophon tell a story of the fall of Babylon, which is perhaps familiar to the reader. At the time that Cyrus was besieging the city it was announced to him that when a mule foaled the city would fall. The foaling of a mule was considered an impossibility. On this occasion, the mule, as everybody knows, did foal, and the army of Cyrus was let into the city by treachery. The allusion to the foaling of a mule occurs in Egyptian history, and was probably one of those wide-spread myths, which, as Baring-Gould shows, are constantly turning up in different forms at various points in history, and in different localities. The latest incident which calls up the Babylonian legend is the sudden death in Paris of M. D'Agrigny de Buch, the last descendant of the famous Captal de Buch. There was in the family, as in hundreds of others in Europe, a prophecy of the immortality of the race. In the DeBuch family, as in that of Macbeth, the prophecy was considered to mean nothing else. It was handed down in a couplet thus translated:

When a horse and a mule are one,
Then the last sire's race is run.

Unfortunately for the DeBuch family, the Directors of the Garden of Acclimation recently bred a mule which could not be distinguished from a mule. The marvel was shown to the last of the line, and, when he realized the situation, he fell dead upon the spot. The case is interesting as an historical as well as psychological study.

A Mysterious Influence.

The particulars of an interesting occurrence at the corset factory of Mr. I. Strouse, on Oak street, Tuesday, will be of interest to students in those occult matters in the mental and physical conditions of human beings which for ages have puzzled the physicians and philosophers of the world. The facts, in brief, are as follows: In the factory of Mr. Strouse a large number of ladies, some of considerable intelligence, are employed in the various branches of work usually performed in every large factory of the kind in the country. At about 11 o'clock in the forenoon of Tuesday, a small knot of girls stood chatting together on different topics, based upon current events as reported in the daily papers, and by a natural progression in the talk they came to speak of sudden deaths, and of the recitals of cases where persons had been cut off from life without previous warning of the nearness of their dying day. There was all at once felt among the girls the shadow of a solemnity as of the sweep of a pall through the room, and the conversation, which had been quite lively, was in a moment hushed as though a spell of silence had been laid upon every tongue. One particularly spirited and pretty girl—Miss Shea—being perhaps disinclined to acknowledge the rather unusual and fearsome sense of something awful which had come among them, in an effort at playfulness, placed on a work-bench near one of the young girls a common land-turtle which had been picked up somewhere. The girl on whose bench it was laid turned and saw it, gave a shriek which sounded elfish in intensity, and immediately fell to the floor in a faint, as though she had been dead. This apparently led to a touch of horror in the minds of the other girls, some of whom grew white in countenance, with a set expression on their faces, and for an instant not a word or cry was uttered. Soon the same kind of thing happened to another of the girls. She fell to the floor in what looked like a dead faint, or the trance of a person exhausted by prolonged mental excitement, leading to exhaustion. Shortly another girl was seized with the same kind of an attack, and she, too, yielded to the influence and was numbered with those who had already given way. One after another of the girls fainted and fell, until no less than seven of the young ladies had been brought low. The affair was so unexpected that consternation, or at least deep interest was shown by the workmen employed in the men's department. Some of them grew pallid and tremulous as if with sudden fear, and pretty soon one of them was taken with an attack similar to that which afflicted the young ladies. He apparently summoned all the forces of his mind and body to resist the mysterious tendency, but he, too, yielded and fainted away. The thing began to look serious. What ailed everybody? was the question with everybody not immediately affected by or under control of this singular nervous dispensation; and at this juncture so painful was the sense of apprehension that, when Mr. Morris, the foreman, ordered a stoppage of the work and a dispersion of the work-people to their homes, a great relief was felt. All were required to move off quietly, and by this judicious treatment no further demonstration became possible.—New Haven Journal.

Afraid of Becoming Witches.

Major Powell says, in his forthcoming book: "The life of an Indian maiden is blithe and merry for a few years, but when she becomes a wife she is soon broken down with the pains of motherhood and the heavy labors which fall to her lot, and she soon becomes wrinkled, garrulous, cross, scolding, in fact, an old hag. Of course such hags are not pleasant company in camp, and in the belief of the Numa such old hags grow uglier and meaner until they dry up and whirlwinds carry them away, when they are transformed into witches, and lest such a fate should befall old women, they are taught that it is their duty to die when no longer needed, and if they do not die by natural means in a reasonable time they must commit suicide. This they seem willing to do rather than to meet that terrible fate of being transformed into witches and being compelled to live in snake skins and wriggle about among the rocks, their only delight being to repeat the words of passers-by in mockery. I once saw three old women thus voluntarily starving themselves. I rode up to what was almost a deserted camp, the three old women only remaining, sitting by the fire and intently gazing into the embers. They seemed to heed not my approach, but sat there mumbling and groaning until they rose, each dragging up her weight with a staff, and then they joined in a sidewise, shuffling senile dance around the fire, propped by their staffs, and singing a doleful song; having finished which they sat down again on their heels, and gazed into the fire, and I rode away. On coming to the new camp of the tribe the next day, and inquiring of Chui-at-um-peak, their chief, why these women were left behind, and what they were doing, I was informed they had determined to commit suicide, fearing lest they should be transformed into witches."

Maine was similarly visited in 1743, 1749, 1754, and 1756, all of which were exceedingly dry seasons.—Chicago Post.

LOCAL NEWS.

THE public entertainment of the "Holland Literary Association," given at Kenyon's Hall, on Friday evening of last week, was attended by a large audience and one that evidently wished to testify by their presence to the interest they felt in the object of the association and the intellectual development of its members. The exercises were as follows:

Singing—"Hark The Song."
Oration—"True Heroism." Mr. A. Broek.

Recitation—"The Curfew must not ring to-night." Miss H. Beuwkes.

Singing—"The Little Brown Church."
Reading of part of "Our Journal"—by Miss A. Van Der Sluis.

Tableau—"The Warning."

Debate—Subject: "Resolved, That the public men of the eighteenth century, were more corrupt than those of the nineteenth are." Affirmative—Mr. E. Smits. Negative—Mr. A. A. Pfanstiehl.

Tableau—"The Past and Future."

Essay—"Amusements." Mr. B. Steketee.

Recitation—"The Mines of Avondale." Miss K. Garrod.

Reading of Journal—Miss A. Van Der Sluis.

Singing—Quartette, "Fair Weather, Friends."

Oration—"Honesty and Truth, the Cement of Society." Mr. A. Vennema.

Tableau—"Sarah's Young Man."

Messrs. K. Schaddelee, W. Cropley and N. Kenyon were called upon as judges on the debate, and decided in favor of the negative.

MAJOR D. C. FITCH, of the 25th Mich. Infantry, died at Staunton, West Virginia, on the 28th of May last. From an extract of the Staunton Visitor we gather the following: He arrived there about eight weeks before with his wife and daughter, seeking employment as a book-keeper. A severe attack of congestive chills and a brief illness of a few days were followed by death. Maj. Fitch was a native of Rochester, N. Y., and during the war was a major in the Twenty-fifth Michigan Infantry. He was a member of a Masonic lodge at Paw Paw, Mich., and leaves a mother and sister in Detroit. His widow has a paid up policy on his life in the Connecticut Life Company, of Hartford, for $2,500. After his death it was first made known that he was a Mason; and the members of Staunton Lodge immediately took charge of his family, and yesterday afternoon his remains were buried from the Episcopal Church, with Masonic ceremonies at the grave.

THE result of the examination of the "Bergman case," before Justice Newham closed on Saturday last, resulting in the discharge of Rense Heyma, and the binding over of the other six respondents for trial in the Circuit Court, at Allegan, in September next. The amount of bail fixed by the Justice is as follows: H. Schutmaat, $1,000; C. Schrier, $500; G. K. De Wit, $1,000; and J. Borgman, U. De Wit and H. De Luit each $300, all of whom recognized themselves in the several amounts stated. The many rumors afloat pending the examination, had led us to believe that some new and more positive evidence would be introduced. In this we have been disappointed, inasmuch as nothing important has been developed, beyond what was already known. The evidence to sustain the charge "with intent to kill," is all or nearly all of a circumstantial or inferential nature, and based mainly or entirely upon the boasting admissions and statements of some of the respondents, made shortly after the assault, the display of clubs and other weapons, and the severity of the weather at the time. To what extent the chain of this evidence will carry conviction is a matter for the court and jury and not for us to comment upon, and we have no doubt these men will have a fair and impartial trial. Taking this case in all its bearings there are many unsatisfactory features about it, and the many theories adopted fail to set the mind at rest. For this reason we are glad to see the case in its present shape. The time intervening between now and the next term of the Circuit Court, should be improved, and especially by the several respondents. Even if there should not be sufficient evidence to convict before a jury—the doubt in such cases going to the benefit of the accused, that fact will not relieve the accused of the "doubt" which remains and is settled in the minds of the community where they live, and where the assault has been committed, unless on the trial their line of defense is different and more explanatory than it was on the examination. Whether it be the old man Schutmaat, aged sixty years and over, or the boys in their unrestrained excesses of youth, we advise them to give satisfactory answer to the general inquiries of an interested public.

FROM Tuesday's proceedings of the General Synod of the Reformed Church we clip the following: President Scott announced Drs. Demarest, Crispell, and Dewitte, of the Theological Seminaries, and asked that the old custom of the Reformed Church, to receive them with honors, be revived. The Rev. E. S. Fairchild said the professors had been in the house half an hour, and talked so loud that the business of the house was retarded, and he felt ashamed to welcome men who treated the Synod so shabbily, with honors. The professors were received by the Synod rising, but Mr. Fairchild would not rise.

THE annual examination at West Point this year promises to be extraordinarily attractive this year. The feature that is expected to draw crowds of visitors being the reunion of the old rebel graduates who during the late war fought against their old classmates who were on the Union side. It is understood that nearly all of the men who figured prominently in the confederate service will come to the friendly gathering; and if this should turn out to be a fact there certainly will be lively times for the officers of the post.

At the laying of the corner-stone of the new Presbyterian Church at Allegan, the other day, a copy each of the Journal and the Democrat was deposited therein, on which incident Dox makes the following comment: "It is sad to think that one hundred or more years hence, when that stone may be opened, in each paper will be found a huge, illustrated circus advertisement."

AN immense citizens meeting was held at Detroit, Monday night, to protest against the passage by the Council of a pending resolution authorizing Sunday liquor selling. Judge C. I. Walker presided, and speeches were made by him and the Rev. Drs. Pierson, Pilkin, and Eddy, United States District Attorney Maynard, J. B. H. Bradshaw, and the Hon. Alfred Russel.

"DEAR me, how fluidly he talks," said Mrs. Partington recently, at a temperance meeting. "I am always rejoiced when he mounts the nostrils, for his eloquence warms every cartridge in my body."

THE True Dutch Reformed Church at this place received a visit last week, from Rev. John G. De Baun, of Hackensack, N. J. In the afternoon he preached in the Holland language to a crowded church. Rev. De B. is of Huguenot descent, and is pastor of a congregation which with a few others constitutes a denomination East, known also as "the True Dutch Reformed Church." The object of the visit as we learn is to prepare the way for an organic union between the two bodies.

CONSIDERABLE anxiety has been felt at this place during the past week relative the whereabouts of the scow Spray, caused by such items as the following: "The lost scow Spray is the smaller of the two scows of that name and was owned by Captain Charles Storing, of Holland. Her crew consisted of three men, all of whom perished. They all lived at Holland, where two of them leave families." She arrived at this port on Monday noon, having made two trips between Racine and some other point on this shore.

They have an ice-house and cellar annexed and intend to make this "a business."

MRS. PARTINGTON declined to allow her daughters to take part in a spelling match because she heard somebody say that knotty words would be given out.—This is a joke, but the following is a fact, that Mr. Partington, an old resident of this city, forbid his daughters to take part in the entertainment of the "Holland Literary Association," at Kenyon's hall last week, because there was a drop-curtain and scenery on the stage. It was also given out that the graduating class of Hope College were to invite or had invited the Cornet Band, to furnish the music at the Commencement exercises; to this Mr. Partington also objected on the ground that the instruments had never been duly "installed." Mr. Partington is growing old, and none the less stubborn.

GOING TO TOWN.

BY KATE H. M. RAMSAY.

The horse stood ready, old gray and the brown, for the family is going to town; The four last in the row, the brown and the gray, And father declares that to town he must go. So the horses are harnessed and hitched to the cart.

While "pa" goes inside to make himself "smart." He takes down the mirror with infinite care And deposits it handily down in a chair, And, mixing his father, with face rather grave, He proceeds to inflict a very clean shave.

This finished, he gets into his suit of "sheep's gray." (A suit that has "stood" him for many a day), And calls for a collar in his own hasty style, That "he's so long getting off," he grumbles the while.

The big jar of butter is covered and tied And into the wagon it goes with a side; The hide of the heifer killed Monday for meat, Is rolled up and carefully tucked under the seat; "The boiler is leaky," declares Susan Jane, "Until it is mended, I shan't wash again."

Thus "stumped," the old gentleman can't say a word, And Tom is sent out to shove it aboard; "The matches are out, the indigo, too," "I guess you'll make out if the duds aren't blue," Says "Pater," while scorn in his gray whisker lurks.

Which ends up at last in a couple of snarls, "I must have a spell," little Billy sings out, "And I want a round comb," says Bell with a pout; "I think you had better get yourself a new hat, Your old one is shabby, you can't do with that."

"Proper sight," quoth the pater, his mind in a fume, "You think if you want it, I'll bring you the moon. Do you think of good greenbacks the men are all made?"

I'd like to know when I'm to get my debts paid," And grabbing his hat with a lowering face, He mounted the wagon, with very bad grace, And cracking his whip with consummate skill, He would soon have been out of sight o'er the hill.

When "father," came borne to his unwilling ear, And "father," in accents more thrilling and clear, He groaned, stopped his horses, and took a fresh cud, And waited, while Tommy came plash through the mud;

"Well, what now, I thought I'd got arrants enough," Said he, just as Thomas came up with a puff, "Why—here—is—a letter, ma wants you to mail, And bring her some stout linen thread without fail."

The poor man shut his mouth with a smile very grim, And made the old horses move on with a vim; His "carriage" mournfully flapped in the breeze, As he passed out of sight near the white willow trees, —Freddie Farmer.

THE ONE FALSE STEP.

"Do you know, Walter, it is exactly one year to-day since we first met? Just think of it. One year to-day!"

"Yes, Ella, darling; and one year to-day hence we'll be old marri—"

But here a dainty hand was applied blushing to the daring lips. And the glowing prediction remained incomplete. The subject was changed with a promptness that seemed a simultaneous inspiration, and along the summer lane the handsome pair joyously jaunted in their cosy basket phaeton.

Walter Carleton was a rising young merchant, the junior member of a New York firm. He was of British birth, and his dark complexion, crisp ebon curls, and deep black eyes he derived from his Castilian mother.

Ella Goodrich was an Una-like creature, in the first flush of her gorgeous womanhood. She was a dark-bred blonde, and the only daughter of wealthy old Dr. Goodrich, of Kirkland.

Walter had received his earliest heart-wound from the dart of Ella's beauty at a Saratoga hop, and since then the course of their love had run as smoothly as two enthusiastic hearts could make it.

Dr. Goodrich, besides closely observing the young man, had made the necessary inquiries respecting him, with the result of thoroughly satisfying his amiable partner and himself on the propriety of their daughter's choice.

It was really a pleasant afternoon—late in the summer—and the gray pony with the basket phaeton and the pair of turtle doves jogged along with a sort of "sober certainty of waking bliss," as Milton happily phrased it.

The miles flew by on angel's wings, and when Walter consulted his watch, lo and behold! it was within a few minutes of the Kirkland dinner hour; and they were a good five miles away!

"We must make all haste back," cried Ella, "pa dislikes to wait for dinner. Rufe, old man," this to the gray pony, "you must put your best foot foremost;" whereupon Rufe's mistress proceeded to admonish him with rein and whip.

Now, Rufe had not been used to this cavalier treatment, and he began to protest against it by manifold head-shakings, tail-switchings, elephantine hops and snortings, and generally by moving forward rather slower than before.

Whereupon Ella scolded the perverse brute, and Walter took the whip and administered a sharp cut across the foreleg. This was enough. Rufus instantly performed some compound circus trick, and cleverly separated himself and the shafts from the body of the phaeton.

Before you could say Jack Robinson the pair of lovers were rolling in the dust, and "Rufe" was complacently regarding the havoc he had made. Dusted and discontented, Walter and Ella regained their feet more scared than hurt and amused than vexed.

Ella said there was a blacksmith-shop a short distance off, and thither Walter ran while she watched the wreck and told "Rufe" what a disreputable old villain he was.

When Walter returned with the mechanic, a tall, bony-looking man with huge red whiskers and an immense Panama hat was talking to Ella. And not merely talking; it seemed to Walter that the man was annoying her, and attempting to take her hand—a liberty she seemed to repel with indignant energy.

"Well, be friends, anyhow, Ella, if you won't shake hands," he of the red whiskers was saying, as Walter, with flashing eyes and vengeful looks, unseen, approached.

"Stand off, sir!" cried he, pushing the intruder violently aside. "By what right do you presume to annoy this young lady?"

Ella uttered a little scream. The man staggered, and nearly fell; but, regaining his equilibrium, he quickly faced round, and fiercely fixed his reddish, chestnut eyes upon his assailant.

"Walter Carleton, as I'm a breathing sinner!"

"Dr. Farjeon!" with a violent start and change of color. "Good God, you here! I beg your pardon for my rudeness. I did not see your face; it was so unexpected. Way, how in the name—I mean how on earth did you ever turn up here?"

"O, that is easily explained," said Dr. Farjeon, with a meaning look. "You see, after we parted at Liverpool dock—"

"Ah yes; just so," said Walter, nervously. "Ella, my dear, Dr. Farjeon and I are old acquaintances—friends and all that, you know. Doctor, I shall be glad to meet you; that is, to confound this mishap; we must get it repaired, and get home at once; mustn't we, Ella?"

Ella had looked with speechless surprise at the chilling effect the doctor's sudden appearance had upon her lover. It had completely transformed him, crushing his gaiety as one crushes a flower in the hand.

With a supercilious "good by, Miss Goodrich," and "I'll see you this evening, Walter," Dr. Farjeon proceeded on his way; when, with a mortified look, Walter said:

"Why, Ella, whatever is that man doing here?"

"If you had not interrupted him, he would have told you soon enough, the hateful, detestable fellow," she replied.

"He lately bought pa's practice; and has come prowling about our house and persecuting me ever since; but to-day I made him feel how intensely I despised him. How on earth did you ever form that Jack-Sheppard-looking sawbone's acquaintance?"

"Merely professionally in Europe," replied Walter, dryly.

Walter's attempts at cheerfulness during the homeward drive were spasmodic failures; and after dinner a gloom settled upon him which Ella vainly sought to dispel. He said he had a slight headache, attributable, probably, to the shock in the afternoon drive.

Just as night was closing in, Dr. Farjeon was seen walking in the direction of the house, and somewhat abruptly Walter uttered some unsatisfactory explanation and joined him. The two men proceeded toward the hemlock grove, and Ella, watching from an upper window, could see that the doctor gesticulated threateningly, and that Walter, her daring and chivalrous Walter, seemed to make piteous appeals to the other's forbearance!

"What can it mean? Oh, whatever can it mean?" sobbed the yearning young heart, as she stood, weary and wretched, watching the retreating forms till they melted into the darkness.

In about an hour Walter returned. He was almost boisterously cheerful. There was triumph in his eye and satisfaction on his brow. Next day was Saturday, and Ella and he spent a delightful day, notwithstanding that he informed her business would call him to the city on Monday, but only for a few days. After that he said he would return and spend a whole uninterrupted fortnight at Kirkland.

On Sunday evening the lovers attended the village church; and as the congregation was dispersing, a lad in a slouch hat that almost concealed his features, suddenly approached Walter, and, with a quick and dextrous movement, placed a note in his hand and disappeared. The action was so sudden that the messenger had vanished before the young man had recovered from his surprise; and although Ella was close by his side, she neither saw the envoy nor the missive he delivered.

Walter was taciturn and reflective at the supper-table, and later in the evening he said he thought he would walk over to Albany before bed time, sleep at the Delavan, and get the early boat in the morning. Ella was clearly vexed and disappointed, but she bade him an affectionate adieu notwithstanding.

Next morning she rose later than usual, and on reaching the breakfast-table found great excitement. The parson and the village druggist were there, so was the ancient Miss Needleton, the scandal purveyor of the place.

"Pierced through the brain from ear to ear!" cried the spinster.

"Well, not exactly," said the druggist, "the ball seems to have entered the highest portion of the forehead rather to the left of the medial line, and proceeded downward through and to the base of the skull."

"That seems very extraordinary, doesn't it?" put in the parson. "I should have fancied the ball traveled the contrary direction—upward—and that the poor fellow was shot from behind."

"But there is the ball lodged as described," said Dr. Goodrich.

"What has happened, pa?" cried Ella, unable longer to bear the cruel suspense.

"Doctor Farjeon has been murdered!" cried the parson, the druggist, and the spinster in chorus, "murdered at ten o'clock last night by an assassin, who escaped from the surgery window."

"O, she's fainting!" cried the mother, rushing to her; "poor darling how the horrid news has shocked her!"

When she recovered she was in her room with her parents. Once alone, she thought long and earnestly of the tragedy; the mysterious relations between her lover and the murdered man, the sudden departure last night of the former, and his strange fits of gloom since he first met the doctor. But, O! it couldn't be. It was monstrous—it was cruel—it was unpardonable to mix Walter, even in imagination, with such a crime. No, no; it wasn't Walter. That was certain.

She would at once write to him, and tell him what a very terrible crime had been committed. Of course he would want to hear about it from Kirkland before he read it in the newspaper. So she wrote a long letter to Walter; and while she was engaged on that pleasant task the police and idle villagers were scouring the country for the assassin. More than one had seen him enter the doctor's house the preceding evening and could generally describe his appearance.

It was twilight when Ella started with her letter to the post-office, half a mile distant, and it was almost dark when she reached the outer grounds of the Kirkland homestead. As she approached the gate, hidden among a clump of maples, a man's form, with outstretched arms, darted before her, and said in a hollow voice:

"My darling Ella!"

She looked an eager, wild look; her heart gave one sickening heave, and, with a sensation of choking, she gasped:

"O, my God, Walter! Say it wasn't you—say it wasn't you!"

He put his arm around her, and led her unresistingly into the heart of the shrubbery. Then, with tremulous earnestness, but with despair in every tone, he said:

"So help me, Heavenly Father, Ella! I am not guilty of—murder!"

She was stricken dumb. Every sense of her being was concentrated in hearing; and she gazed fixedly at his palled face when the moon came out, and held his right hand in both of hers, while he whispered his strange, sad, terrible story.

Briefly, it was this:

When a fatherless lad he was placed in a Liverpool banking-house, where he was a favorite. Gradually he mingled in "fast" society and frequented the gambling table; and, once, in a terrible strait, he forged his patron's name.

Stricken down with sickness immediately after, and fever and delirium supervening, he raved incessantly about his crime. Dr. Farjeon, then a graduate, attended him, and possessed himself of the facts of the crime, and when he recovered brought the patron to the penitent's bedside.

He was pardoned on promise of amendment, on condition that he would leave England forever. Dr. Farjeon was mortified at this display of magnanimity, and when he parted from Walter, said:

"Be careful in America, or I may have to play the detective in another role."

"You know," continued the fugitive, as the sobbing girl hung on his neck—"you know how we met; but you do not know that when we were alone the same night he threatened to expose what he termed my 'antecedents,' unless I would pay him $5,000 hush money. He said that he passionately loved you, Ella; that you laughed at him and despised him, inasmuch that he literally raved and cursed at the prospect of our happiness."

"Well, last evening, as we left church, a lad put a note in my hand; and, when alone, I opened it and found it an imperative command to meet him at his house between nine and ten. That is why I met you—"

"Well!" she eagerly cried.

"I went. He insolently told me I must 'come down' with $20,000 within a week, or he would brand me before the world. I was greatly excited. I could not raise so much money, and I called him opprobrious names. He seemed to think I meant him personal harm, and, being naturally a coward, he drew his pistol. I seized it, and in the struggle it was discharged when both our hands were above our heads. You know the result. I jumped from the window and fled, I knew not whither."

"Then, it was only a dreadful accident," she burst out. "You have committed no crime. It was not your fault!"

"Ah! Ella, dearest, who but yourself will believe—I will be convinced of this?"

"Where is the note—the note he sent you last night? That will show something," she eagerly said.

"Lost, Ella."

The unhappy maiden uttered a despairing cry and fainted away, and almost at the same moment two officers sprang through the branches and arrested Walter Carleton for the murder of Simon Farjeon.

"Appearances are certainly very much against the young man," Dr. Goodrich was forced to admit to his wife, as they observed some symptoms of recovery in their daughter's brain fever. "Still some explanation may be forthcoming. I can't believe young Carleton a deliberate murderer."

The prisoner's lawyer was working like a beaver. Yet he was unable to account for the disappearance of the note, or to discover the messenger who had delivered it at the church door. If either turned up it would explain the prisoner's motive in visiting the doctor that night, while the direction of the wound, as well as the pistol, which was the dead man's, would probably be sufficient to acquit the prisoner.

The Coroner's jury fully committed the young man after they had heard the evidence of the two officers who arrested him, and who overheard his damaging confessions to Miss Goodrich. Everybody admitted that it would go hard with him, when an unexpected clue came to light.

There was an idiotic lad in the village who had a mania for stealing—especially articles of wearing apparel; and whenever poor Willie Webster was seen out of doors with a parcel he was pretty sure to be overhauled by the first villager he met.

One morning, at the stage to which our story has reached, the lunatic lad was observed by the parson to leave the residence of the late doctor with a large bundle. Visions of a wholesale kleptomaniac rushed through the holy man's brain, and he speedily pursued and captured Willie. The poor fellow's story was straight enough. Sally Mabane, the doctor's servant, had given him the clothes for himself, and they weren't the doctor's clothes either; they were Sally's clothes—Sally's own clothes, and nobody else's.

The parson steered the lunatic and the bundle back to Sally Mabane's presence, and sharply cross-examined her. Albeit she was a tough customer, the clergyman plied her with the terrors of the judgment day, of the undying worm and the quenchless brimstone fire—until she wilted and made an open confession. She had several times worn these boy's clothes on the late master's business. In fact, he had procured them for her. She had worn them the last time on Sunday night, when she delivered the note to young Carleton. She wept violently when the parson said he did not believe her story, and threatened to have her arrested.

"I assure you, sir, it's all true," she said, weeping violently; "I haven't told you a lie, sir, here is the very letter I took the young gentleman, sir; I saw master write it, and I know it by that mark on the inside, for I saw him write it; it was lying in the surgery open, just like that (showing how) when I first saw him lying dead."

When the trial came on Sally Mabane's evidence and the fatal Sunday-evening letter led to Walter Carleton's acquittal. But the Liverpool story of the one false step that plunged two young hearts in misery and produced this blight and desolation also came to light. He never married Ella Goodrich, for there was an earlier and later taint upon his name—a forger and a homicide.

On the second anniversary of their acquaintance the lovers rode in the basket phaeton behind Rufe for the last time. And the next day she entered a monastery, and he sailed for South America.

The Masher of the Iron Mines.

He was always mad. During the flush times of 1872-73 he used to loaf around the docks and invite sundry and divers persons to climb up and sit on the fleshy part of his arm. He was muscular, and knew it. In the flush and boom of early manhood, he was the lofty olly-hock, tottering over the modest catnip.

He wore his pants stuffed into high top boots, a strap girding his waist, blue flannel shirt turned under low down on his breast, and a broad hat which swept away from his beetling forehead like the fantail of a ferry-boat. When a large load of coal or limestone tied up at the dock, he would shove his hands inside the top of his pantaloons, swagger up to the edge of the pier and squirt out three gills of tobacco juice. This was the size of his mouth. He was slow, and deliberate, and great. If he heard of a fighting mate on board any of the vessels in port, or even a common sailor whom nature had upholstered, as it were, to order, he longed for his blood, and sought him out with an earnestness that was beautiful in its devotion. Everybody liked him. He was frank, open-hearted, and would just as leave kick your head as to look at you. If he desired to drink, all he did was to saunter up to one of his numerous admirers and inquire what the Governor of North Carolina said to the Governor of South Carolina, and the reply of the latter executive that he considered it a long time between drinks, usually ended in quenching his thirst at some body else's expense. He was a bruiser from Brunserville, he was, and admitted, reluctantly, that he had cleaned out no less than four circuses and eleven canal boats during the course of his cheerful and happy existence. Buffalo Tom came up on an ore barge just to find out who he was, and went back supplied with data and information that exceeded his most sanguine expectations. The Detroit Pile Driver came up and had an interview, and his friends made him as comfortable as possible on his way back to that city. The panic came and he smiled a lofty smile, stepped on board the cars and beat his way out to Utah. Last winter a snow-slide rushed down the mountain and buried him sixteen feet deep. But he gradually wiggled out, came to the surface, and requested them to fetch on a decent snow-slide if they were going to have any truck with him!—Marquette Mining Journal.

A French Love Tragedy.

[Paris Correspondence St. Louis Globe.]

* * * The wedding was to take place on Christmas day. Three weeks before that date the affianced husband sought Minnie, and told her he had deceived himself; that he could not and would not abandon her; that he loved her ten times more than he ever could love the other woman. Minnie was happy, and yet she was wretched. She declared she ought not to keep him; that she must not keep him. Finally he told her that he did not believe his betrothed really loved him. This shook her resolution. She said no more. She determined, however, to see and judge for herself.

She had learned where the fair Bostonian was residing, and, making some ingenious excuse, gained an interview, without revealing her true character. She found the American lovely; that she was well-nigh heart-broken at the neglect of her lover; that she knew he had a mistress; that she suspected he was still bound by his old attachment; that she was the barrier between her and happiness. The grisette went away. She saw the artist no more, but she wrote him a long letter, telling him how much he had wronged the beautiful girl he was engaged to; that she worshipped him and would make him happy. The next day Minnie was dead in her lodgings, asphyxiated by charcoal. She had deliberately destroyed herself to secure the happiness of another woman, and that woman her rival.

The Allentown (Pa.) Chronicle and News says: "Jacob Ginter was a farmer and manufacturer of mill-stones in the Minisink Valley, and one day when out hunting he discovered the first specimen of anthracite coal. His son still carries on the old business at the old place, and, while in comfortable circumstances, he has not profited apparently from his father's great discovery, which has enriched so many men and created such a vast business interest in this State."

ANSWERED.

BY BELLE W. COOKE.

Not in my way nor at my time
My heart's petitions answer gain;
I ask, and all my days are full
Of longing that I may attain.
"This time," I cry, "do not delay;
Give me the boon I ask to-day."

But opportunity goes by,
And while I pray my lips are fed
With something that I have not asked,
Nay, what I wanted not, instead,
But still the food is sweet, I find,
And leaves no taste of gall behind.

The Master's hand has blessed the gift,
And so it must be good for me;
And yet my heart goes sighing still
For that which I had hoped to see.
No pain or labor would I spare
If he would only grant this prayer.

I see the hands of others filled
With that which I have been denied;
And they care not, but scorn perchance,
Because they are so well supplied.
I see and pray (what e'er my quest);
I wonder, let me know when I am blest."

I longed, on, nor e'er forget
The treasure that I crave the most,
And think, "Perhaps it is too late,
All opportunity is lost!"
When lo! I see the blessing sweet
Is lying, fair, beneath my feet!

Early Authorship.

Ruskin, the great art critic of England, does not approve of early authorship. He recently said:

"I was obliged to write too young, when I knew only half-truths, and was eager to set them forth with what I thought fine words. People used to call me a good writer then; now they say I can't write at all; because, for instance, if I think anybody's house is on fire, I only say, 'Sir, your house is on fire'; whereas, formerly, I used to say, 'Sir, the abode in which you probably passed the delightful days of your youth is in a state of inflammation,' and everybody used to like the effect of the two p's in 'probably passed,' and of the two d's in 'delightful days.'"

MICHIGAN University seems resolved to advertise itself periodically by some fresh embroilment. On the 6th of May, 1874, it will perhaps be remembered, an order of the faculty, suspending a number of students for hazing, took effect. The anniversary of this event was celebrated by the young men now connected with the institution with many festivities. The first thing on the program was a supper, which passed off very quietly. Barring the exhibition of bad taste, there was no fault to find thus far. But after the supper the participants felt in so jovial a mood that they could not forbear a little of that exhilarating exercise which the physicians regard as conducive to good digestion. They accordingly laid hold of the entire stock in trade of a certain roofer, consisting of a quantity of wood and tar and of a wagon, and with them built a glorious bonfire.

With the headaches and general discomfort which succeeded this ebullition of spirits came a pricking conscience and sober second thought. A committee of the junior class was appointed to visit the aggrieved mechanic and see what reparation he would demand. They unfortunately encountered him before his blood had time to cool, and he estimated his material damage at the round sum of five hundred dollars. The students decline to settle on such terms, and the matter will probably soon find its way into the courts.

Scarcely a week had elapsed since this occurrence when an injunction was granted to the proprietors of the Ann Arbor City Mills, restraining the Regents of the University from obtaining water from a spring on a neighboring farm. This order was directed against the proposed new waterworks which the University is constructing at an expense of five thousand dollars. The recent laying of a six-inch pipe from the spring to the University grounds is alleged to have injured the mill property of the plaintiffs to the amount of one thousand dollars.

SOME new cases of deaths, due to the eating of pork invested with trichina, which are being quoted in Western journals, should be the means of directing public attention anew to the horrible disease of swine, called trichinosis, and to the fact that, when once the parasite attacks a human being, the result is prolonged suffering and, in a multiplicity of instances, death. The worm existing in the pork literally bores its way out of the stomach and into the muscles. It has lately been found that swine may become invested with trichina through eating carrion, or even decayed vegetable substances. This is a point worth consideration by those who incline to the belief that dead chickens, putrid swill, or any other filth about the place is legitimate food for the pig. The animal is not dainty in his tastes, and will lunge off his dead relatives with infinite gusto; but it is the poorest economy to permit him to assume the role of scavenger. No milk dealer will allow his cows to eat garlic if he can help it, though the brutes are crazily fond of the odoriferous weed; and there is certainly more reason for the farmer to see that his porkers have no access to unclean food. In the one case, if precaution be neglected, the taste of the milk is affected; in the other the entire flesh is rendered poisonous and dangerous food.

FORNER'S Press, while generally approving of the Pennsylvania Republican platform, says: "Some of the resolutions might have been worded more compactly, and it would have shown more dignity and strength to have omitted altogether the cheap equalization-of-bounty cry. The politicians rate the soldier too near their own level if they think he is to be swayed by such talk as this. The men who fought for thirteen dollars a month when the politicians were dodging the draft are not blinded by any such transparent nonsense."

THE "Besemer" steamer is about to commence her regular traffic between England and France. The voyage is about 22 miles in length, and steamers of 400 or 500 tons burthen, and 300 or 400 horse power, have been hitherto found large enough for the traffic. But the Besemer is 350 feet long and 40 feet broad, as large as many of the Atlantic steamers, although her tonnage is somewhat less than her dimensions would indicate, owing to the low freeboard at each end of the vessel. Her engines have already indicated 4,600 horse power.

HOLLAND, Aug. 13, 1874. 108-ly

De Feyter Bro's,

DEALERS IN
Wood, Lumber, Bark, Ties,
Timber, and all kinds of Wood Produce.

We have put up in our woods, (on the Lake Shore Road, two miles West of the white school-house on the Grand Haven road) a first-class portable saw-mill which is now in good running order, and can serve the public at any time with all kinds of building material and fencing at low prices, and deliver the same wherever wanted.

We can lengthen out so as to saw 40 feet, and will make long lumber and timber a specialty. Our facilities for getting out deck planks and any kind of ship timber are unequalled.

All bills will be filled promptly and with dispatch, and a fair dealing can be relied upon. Custom sawing done at bottom figures.

All kinds of Farm Products, taken in pay for Lumber and sawing. Also Wood, Bark and Railroad Ties, when delivered at our Pier on Lake Michigan, or on any of the docks along Black Lake.
